Netanyahu says U.S. is on verge of 'bad deal' with Iran over nuclear program

With dark warnings and a call to action, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel used one of the world's most prominent venues on Tuesday to denounce what he called a "bad deal" being negotiated with Iran. According to The Washington Post, in a rousing speech before Congress punctuated by more than 40 bursts of applause, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Tuesday assailed the Obama administration's nuclear negotiations with Iran, asserting that the United States was on the verge of making "a bad deal." Netanyahu used the address Tuesday to paint Iran as a sponsor of terrorism that is marching across the Middle East and determined to realize its nuclear ambitions. Netanyahu said the country poses a "grave threat" to Israel and the world. Netanyahu said that demands should be tougher and urged that "if Iran threatens to walk away from the table, call their bluff." He said tough economic sanctions would bring them back to talks.
